"The Abyssal plain, which lies at a depth of around 11,500ft, is not only uncharted but also the biggest habitat on the planet," he rhapsodises. "There are about two million described species on Earth but probably more like 20 million in existence. When I'm smoking out a big rainforest tree there will guaranteed be new species of insects and spiders that come out. Sometimes everything we find is new."

Obviously, there is still an education gap involved that still bares great weight. Women with a higher education appear to have children when they are older and more prepared, as opposed to women with little education, who become mothers when they are very young and usually end up having more children along the way.

That's down to Ed but also to three problems that affect the Left globally. First, they lack the ability to articulate what they stand for. The old certainties of class war have gone. When the Left moved to the centre-ground in the 1990s, it briefly captured the middle and enjoyed predominance. But its neoliberal policies alienated the base in the long-run and – crucially – left the party without a narrative. Ed's inability to connect was, therefore, symptomatic. The way to make a connection is either to present oneself as the authentic voice of a dynamic social force (the Harold Wilson approach in 1964) or as a visionary who pledges to build a New Jerusalem (the Attlee approach in 1945). The contemporary Left is neither of these things. It offers neither representation nor dreams.

Which brings us back to tuition fees. Yes, Clegg, Cable et al could have refused to back the tuition fee rise but they claim to have been persuaded by the Tory justification for the policy, and anyway, they were never going to get everything in their manifesto through the coalition agreement negotiations.

Forget all the pompous nonsense about them "putting the country first". That's not what Nick Clegg and his team did in May 2010. They put their party first by putting it into power. Either the Liberal Democrats were a political party with the desire to govern or they were an insignificant pressure group. It was time to choose.

For me, there is no Etonism more dumb-founding than the “General, Total Failure”. This is what, when my husband was at school, they called the lowest-achieving boy in the school. And by “they”, I don’t mean a gang of horrible playground bullies. I mean the teachers.
