Unsurprisingly, Tinder is dominated by a relatively youthful audience. 38% are aged between 16 and 24, while 45% are between 25 and 34. It's likely to remain this way, especially as Tinder is charging the over 30s more for premium features.

Look at the wider political context. A strong Conservative Party performance will ensure the continuation of a government that is led by David Cameron, a climate that has proven to be very hospitable for Ukip growth. This also introduces the likely prospect of a national referendum on Britain's membership of the European Union - something that Farage has spent his life working for. Meanwhile, many Ukip insiders will be pointing to their results in other areas of the country, and ironically outside of the areas where they have been working hardest. For the first time since 2010 we have real evidence of Ukip's ability to win significant support in a large swathe of Labour-held territory in northern England and Wales - and at the exact moment when Labour has been wiped off the map in Scotland.

But voters dressed in party T-shirts would not be able to enter the polling station as it may be intimidating. Political figures in the wider sense may be fine, for instance a T-shirt of Che Guevara would be acceptable. The onus is on encouraging people to vote. But a line has to be drawn somewhere. Pyjamas are allowed. A topless man is okay. But a topless woman would be too distracting, Tonkin said.
