7	antibiotic minocin	But even without migration, those projections probably understate the future recovery of the birth rate in Europe. For some years now, birth rates in most European countries have been increasing, not declining. Throughout the Continent, women and men keep saying that they want on average at least two children. True, they have been saying so for the past 40 years, but the effect is now being felt in north-western Europe (including France, the Nordic countries and the UK), where birth rates are relatively close to the level needed to replace the population in the long run (equivalent to just under 2.1 children per woman).
