When the shift was imminent, I got a letter stating I could keep my plan, keep my doctor if a number of criteria was met, one of which was at least one new enrollee in my plan each month thereafter. But... buried in the details was that the plan was no longer able to be offered under the new law. So much for that one new enrollee. Yep, zero effect.

In the early hours of Friday morning, Neil Kinnock took to the TV to blame the voters for the result. He said that too many of them had put their own fears of economic insecurity before the interests of the poor. He may well be right, but he misses a point: people do generally vote in what they perceive to be the interests of them and their families. The job of the Left isn't to scorn that, but to try to convince people that helping others is in their interest, too – to link the needs of the community to the aspirations of the individual. Sadly, when the Left fails to do this and loses as a result, it tends to blame everyone but itself. What it doesn't realise is that the voters don't respond well to rich celebrities telling them that the Tories would drown the NHS in the bathtub, or that there's some grand capitalist conspiracy to keep Miliband out of Number 10. Voters want to be reasoned with, not bludgeoned to death with Puritan moralising.

I had to figure out how to be a father, I had to figure out how to provide for my family," he said.
